Godfrey of Bouillon Worthy of Example?

Mary Colvin

Godfrey of Bouillon (Godfrey de Boo-yon): a name familiar to many, but his deeds less so. This holy knight dedicated his life to violence for the sake of The Catholic Church. Our times are not the same as his, so we may not necessarily conclude to take the same action as this great knight. But, as it goes, without learning of the heroics of our forefathers, we risk permanently deforming our conception of the virtuous Catholic man, hamstringing ourselves and our posterity. From the preface of The Siege of Jerusalem, published in 1983, which present a re-translation of William of Tyre's chronicle of the same.

Godfrey of Bouillon is to us of the 19th century a very shadowy personage, known chiefly as one of the leading characters in Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered, and it would certainly not occur to us, were we called upon to name the world's greatest heroes, to place him high up in the list.

Young, chivalrous, and sincerely religious, Godfrey of Bouillon seems from the very beginning of the First Crusade to have aroused the popular admiration, and to have been singled out from among his peers to become the subject of tradition, legend and poetry. In fact, by common consent he was regarded as the central figure of the Crusades; and there is no doubt that Caxton only voices the general opinion of his time when he "stalls" him in "thyrdle stalle of the moost worthy of Cristen men," and ranks him as the world's greatest hero since Arthur and Charlemagne. Even less than a hundred years after his death, at the time that William of Tyre wrote his history, traditions and legends were widely spread. Over some of them the discriminating William shakes his head, in particular, wisely refusing to credit the story of the swan, which strangely enough, after having been brought from the East by Oriental storytellers, had attached itself to the family of Bouillon. Of this very legend, William says, "Praeterinus denique studiose licet id verum fuisse plurimorum, astruat narratio cugini fabulam, unde vulgo dicitur, sementivam eis fuisse originem, eo quod a vero videatur deficere talis assertio."

Other traditions, equally false but more probable and natural, he accepts, and bravely incorporates in the interesting little sketch which he gives us of the life of Godfrey, in the ninth book of his history, when narrating the circumstances of the choice of the first king of Jerusalem. Indeed, late investigations have shown that much of the biography of Godfrey of Bouillon which has been regarded as authentic, is either without any foundation in fact, or has been obtained from unreliable sources. In the few pages following, I give a brief account of what is really known of the life of Godfrey of Bouillon. This account, although containing information regarding our hero's early life—from outside sources—yet on the whole follows William of Tyre, and fulfils the double purpose of giving a brief biography of Godfrey of Bouillon, and, at the same time, a short résumé of Caxton's book, from the point where Godfrey puts on the cross, to start for the Holy Land.

The year of Godfrey's birth is not positively known, but its most probable date is 1060. His birth-place is equally uncertain, some authorities stating that he was born in Baisy, Brabant, thus making him a German subject both by birth and adoption. Most of the later historians and biographers have, however, decided in favour of Boulogne-sur-Mer, in France, his father's ancestral home. Here Godfrey and his two brothers were very carefully reared by their pious and intelligent mother, whose teachings seem to have had a life-long influence over them all.

Godfrey, who at an early age was adopted by his childless uncle Godfrey, duke of Lower Lorraine, spent much of his childhood in Brabant, and at the age of seventeen succeeded to the March of Antwerp and all his uncle's allodial possessions. Among these was the family castle of Bouillon, from which he took his title, which curiously enough Caxton has altered into "Bolyone," confounding it evidently with that of his father and brother in France. The early manhood of Godfrey, up to the call for the First Crusade, as narrated by enthusiastic biographers, and repeated to a certain extent by William of Tyre, represents him already as a brilliant, irresistible hero. According to these traditions, Godfrey appears at the court of the Emperor of Germany, surrounded by glittering retainers. Henry, impressed by the stately manner and beautiful person of the youthful hero, inquires "Who is this noble-looking knight?" and kisses him when he learns his name, twice on the chin and cheek. Then follows a series of knightly deeds. Godfrey succours the poor orphan, protects the friendless, and fights a duel for part of his heritage unjustly claimed by a relative. He is chosen from all the German nobles to carry the banner of his emperor against Rudolph of Suabia, and kills this same Rudolph on the field of battle. Then comes the famous journey to Rome, where Henry besieges the Pope, and Godfrey, after wonderful deeds of valour, is the first to enter the city. Here, tradition says, heated by battle, he drank too freely of wine, and was in consequence seized with a fever, which lasted until he put on the cross for the First Crusade, when he immediately became well. William of Malmesbury, who relates the story, states that Godfrey had no return of his malady during all the exposures of the First Crusade, until Jerusalem was taken, and a Christian government thoroughly established; then, his mission on earth being fulfilled, God permitted his fever to seize him again so violently, that in a few days he died of it. All of these stories except the last are plausible, and probable enough, but we do not find authorities to confirm them. Godfrey's life up to the time of the First Crusade—as nearly as can be gathered from documents and authentic records—was that of an ordinary young knight of good family. He was courageous and upright, and occupied himself chiefly in protecting his possessions from powerful and greedy neighbours, and in attending to his own affairs. His chief care seems to have been to advance to the best of his ability his own worldly interests; and there seems to have been very little manifestation of religious enthusiasm, or indeed of those heroic qualities which were soon to develop him into a world-renowned hero, and obtain for him honours which the world esteemed as among the greatest that could be conferred upon mortal man. This much is really known of him. He had a quarrel with Count Theodore of Flammes, whom he took prisoner, and kept in du-rance vile for the rest of his life. When only seventeen, he was besieged in the Castle of Bouillon, just after his uncle's death, by Albert count of Namur, and by the Bishop of Verdun. Against this combined attack Godfrey defended his fortress with skill and energy. The lords of Bouillon up to 1076 were also counts of Verdun, but after this time, Bishop Theoderic wished to have the title and the property bestowed upon Albert of Namur. Godfrey naturally opposed this intention, and not only protected himself and thwarted their purpose, but laid waste the diocese of the Bishop, and harassed him and his ally in every possible way.

That Godfrey did go to Rome, to aid the Emperor against the Pope, seems definitely established, and as a reward for his services, in 1089, Henry bestowed upon him the duchy of Lower Lorraine, which had been refused him after the death of his uncle.

When the call for the First Crusade came in 1095, from Urban II, at the council of Clermont, Godfrey decided at once to go, and set about his preparations with such energy that he was the first of the great princes ready to start, although his retinue was one of the largest, for under his standard were ranged 10,000 horsemen and 80,000 infantry. At this time, it is certain that he had no idea of devoting his life to the conquest of Jerusalem, and no intention of expatriating himself for ever. He sold his castles of Stenay and Monzon to the Bishop of Verdun, with whom he seems to have been on good terms again; he also mortgaged the Seignory of Bouillon to the Bishop of Liege, but on the express condition that he himself, or three of his nearest heirs especially named, might buy the property back within fourteen years. The price fixed was 1300 silver marks, and three gold marks. This price is given by Gilles d'Arval. Ordericus Vitalis says that he received 7000 marks of silver for them, while Albert d'Aix makes it only 1500. The bishop had a great deal of difficulty in raising this large sum of money, and even went so far as to despoil the shrine of St. Lambert, the altar, the pulpit, and the sacerdotal vestments, of their gold and precious stones, besides taking everything valuable that he could lay his hands on in the convents and monasteries of his diocese.

The fact that Godfrey made a series of unusually rich donations to different churches and religious houses between the years 1090 and 1096 is well authenticated. In 1090 the records show that he restored to the Abbey of Gorze, in the diocese of Metz, the church of St. Dagobert at Stenay. In 1096 he gave many large gifts to this same church in concert with his brother Baldwin. In 1094, in concert with his mother and brothers, he presented the church of Baisy to the monastery of St. Pierre at Bouillon. He also founded at Antwerp the chapter of St. Michel, transferred later to the church of Notre Dame. In 1096 he assigned five manors to the monastery of Afflighem, situated near Genappe; and the same year the family, as a whole, gave the church of Genappe, with all its revenues, to the same monastery. Godfrey also gave the castle of Falkenstein to the church of Notre Dame at Verdun, and presented the chapter of St. Jervais, at Maestricht, with an estate that he possessed on the Meuse.

Godfrey's worldly and religious affairs thus being all put in order, as we see, he finished his preparations and started for the Holy Land in August 1096, with his brothers Eustache and Baldwin. As for the oft-repeated statement that Godfrey was the officially appointed leader of the First Crusade, there is no truth in it. The Papal Legate, Bishop Adhemar of Puy, was the only person to whom any authority had in any sense been officially delegated; but there was no one particular leader of this great movement in the strict sense of the word; each great prince prepared his own outfit, and gathered his army, and set out, when and how it best pleased him. If Godfrey has always been considered the central figure of the First Crusade, it is owing not to his political position, but to his moral influence and personal character, probably because it was instinctively felt that he, more than any other of the great princes, was in sympathy with the tendencies and motives that called it into being.

Godfrey's journey to Constantinople, which city Adhemar had chosen as the rendezvous of all the princes, was not an easy one. He found all the countries through which he had to pass excited and unfriendly, owing to the outrages which had been perpetrated upon their inhabitants by the undisciplined bands of common people that had preceded him.

The Inspiration of Scripture

Necessary or Optional?

Fr Bede Jarrett

From Meditations for Layfolk, 1915.

The Scriptures are the inspired Word of God, the written testimony left to man of the nature of God's being, and of His providence in the governance of the world. In the Old Testament we have the record of His dealings with the human race, more particularly of His action towards the Hebrew people, and of His gradual unfolding to them, by successive revelations, of His unity, power, wisdom, love. By details of historic fact, which in some instances are absolutely intermixed with doctrinal meaning, we learn the story of Creation, of the Fall, of the chastisements that in consequence hardened men's lot on earth, of the Deluge, of the call of Abraham, and of the prophetic announcement of the Messiah to come, the expected of the nations. Now it is possible that the knowledge of some of those historic facts may have been learnt by the sacred authors from contemporary documents, the baked-clay cylinders or inscriptions of which the last generations made such wonderful discovery. Certainly at times we have definite references given by the writers in the Scriptures to court chronicles, on which, obviously, their own accounts are based; and one such writer describes his volume as the laborious abbreviation of the records of his time. There is, then, nothing at all harmful in saying that Biblical inspiration does not mean that the ideas or materials for the construction of the works were infused directly by God. They may or may not have been. But at any rate it would be quite sufficient if God simply illumined the judgement of the inspired writer as to which facts he was to single out for record, and which particular version of them he was in the main to follow. He may at times have been really little else than an editor of another's work; as Baruch may be the inspired writer of the Lamentations of Jeremias. The inspired writer is moved in his intelligence to judge, and in his will to cause to be set down, the exact wording that God desired.

In the New Testament God made a full and new revelation of Himself. It was no longer the gradual process which had been a real addition in revelation, but an immediate and full revelation which should yet contain seeds of truth whose development might take centuries for their full growth. The shrine of this revelation was twofold, the living tradition of the Church and the New Testament. Between them every fragment of the teaching of Christ has been preserved for the race. Neither alone suffice, but they need to be supplemented by each other. And here, again, it is necessary to notice that Scriptural inspiration does not necessitate the infusion of fresh knowledge into the mind of the writer solely by the direct intervention of God. Much of the Gospels was known personally to the writers; and they may even have made some use of a primitive record, written or orally preserved among the Christians: at any rate there is much in the Scriptures which while being inspired need not be revealed. Thus when Saint Paul says that he left his cloak at Troas, did God reveal this to him while he sat and composed or dictated his Epistle? We do not know whether it was revealed or no; of this only are we certain, that it need not have been. It would certainly have sufficed had Saint Paul remembered merely by natural memory, perhaps even at the prompting of a fellow-labourer, where he had last had his cloak. There would have come a light into his judgment illuminating him as to what to set down, and an impulse in the will causing him to set it down in writing; and that is all that is meant by inspiration. So, again, the rising or setting of the sun is not taught as a revealed dogma, but the writer was inspired by God to use that particular expression.

But for our purposes it is necessary only to realize that the Bible is intended as a literature of moral and doctrinal teaching. It is a literature and not a single book: that is to say, it is made up of parts which, to be understood, must be interpreted in the sense in which they were written. It would be foolish to take poetry as literally as prose, nor should I be surprised if, in a professed abridgement, statements should occur seemingly contradictory, since the space was not sufficiently ample to allow of a full explanation. Therefore it is of the first importance I should find the purpose that lay behind the author's mind and his object in composing, or the circumstances which inclined him to insert this and omit that. Secondly, not only have I to realize the intention of the human author, but I have also to bear in mind that the Divine Author had His own vaster designs in the composition of the work. He saw before Him all those people and occasions whence comfort, or help, or perplexity were to arise; and for them, for me, the whole was issued. Just as I can say that God died for me, so as truly can I say that for me, too, for my instruction, were the whole Scriptures composed; for my moral and doctrinal enlightenment were these several books inspired; in them am I to find the teaching my soul needs. Particularly is this true of the New Testament, wherein I can see the record of that Perfect Life which is to be the model of my own. In language simple and full of force, that has formed the meditation and consolation of numberless souls, this life has made men and women devoted to their fellows. Above all, it should lift me up to a union with Himself where I can be buried in His love.

Following the Danube, he arrived peacefully enough at the boundaries of Hungary. Here however he encountered great difficulties, so that it took him the whole month of September to traverse that country. The first part of November he crossed Bulgaria, and finally reached Nissa, where he received friendly messages from the Greek emperor Alexis, which he accepted in good faith. When he came to Phillipopolis, however, he learned that Hugh of Vermandois, brother of the king of France, who had proceeded him to Constantinople by another route, instead of being treated by the Greeks with the consideration due to his lofty rank, was held a prisoner by the Emperor. Indignant at this treatment, Godfrey—who had scrupulously refrained from molesting the inhabitants of the countries through which he passed—immediately gave his men licence to pillage the land. This summary proceeding soon brought the Emperor to his senses, and he begged Hugh’s pardon for his imprisonment, and agreed to set him free as soon as the French army should arrive in front of Constantinople. Not being able to obtain his ends by force, the crafty Alexis then changed his tactics, and by flattery and gifts soon persuaded Hugh, who was a vain young prince, to take the oath of allegiance to him—hoping to induce all the other barons and princes to follow this example. Godfrey was the next to arrive; but on being summoned to swear fealty and obedience to the Emperor, he utterly refused to do so, exclaiming reproachfully to Hugh, who came to him a second time to persuade him to take this step, “What! you, a king’s son, have become a slave also!” But as the winter wore on, and Alexis showed himself so unfriendly, Godfrey began to fear that, unless this concession were made, they might be long delayed in their undertaking, or indeed be hindered altogether from going on to Jerusalem. Albert of Aix, who gives a fuller report of these negotiations than William of Tyre, states that finally Godfrey consented to become Alexis’ liege man, rather than bring about an open rupture with him, saying that he had not left home to overturn Christian kingdoms, but to get the Emperor’s help in carrying Christian weapons against Jerusalem. This matter being settled the barons and princes decided to leave Constantinople, and to continue on their holy journey. The first city of importance beyond Constantinople on Mussulman territory was Nicaea, the capital of Bithynia, then under the rule of Solyman’s son David, surnamed Kilidge-Arslan, or the Sword of the Spirit. This town, although strongly fortified, the Crusaders resolved to besiege. Godfrey fought valiantly, and performed wonderful deeds of valour, but he was not successful as the director of this siege. Nothing was really accomplished before Nicaea until Bohemond, Prince of Tarentum, arrived. He infused new life and energy into everything, and soon forced Kilidge-Arslan to surrender.

In accordance with the oath that they had sworn at Constantinople, the Crusaders handed the city over to Alexis, on the 27th of June, 1097. Having rested themselves thoroughly, they set off again for Syria by way of Phrygia, Cilicia, and the passes of the Taurus. Very unwisely the army divided, the main body, under Godfrey, Raymond of Toulouse, Adhemar, and Hugh of Vermandois, crossing the plain of Dorylaeum, while a smaller force, commanded by the Duke of Normandy, Bohemond, and Tancred, turned off to the left. Kilidge-Arslan, after his flight from Nicaea, nothing daunted by his defeat, had collected an army of about 200,000 men, and had returned, hoping to retrieve his misfortunes. As soon as he learned of the division of the army of his opponents, he determined to attack the smaller body. A terrible slaughter ensued. The Sarcens were on the point of gaining a complete victory, when the main army came up to the rescue, preceded by Godfrey and fifty knights, who had been too impatient to wait for their slower-moving companions. In a moment the situation was changed. The Saracens were thoroughly routed, and fled in every direction, leaving their tents and a rich booty to the victors.

The Crusaders continued their route after their victory, through an arid and desolate country, suffering incredible tortures from hunger, thirst, and heat; and it was not until they arrived in Armenia that relief was obtained. Here Baldwin left the main body of the army in order to besiege Edessa, which seemed to him too tempting a piece of booty to be left behind, while

Godfrey and the other princes marched towards Antioch in Syria, which great and powerful city they realized must be taken before they could go on to Jerusalem.

Bagi Sijan, a Seljoucide prince, was at this time Emir of Antioch. For several years the whole Mahommedan world had been convulsed by internal religious dissensions. The two parties, whose heads resided respectively in Egypt and Bagdad, were struggling for the mastery in Palestine. Bagi Sijan,—or Baghistan, as he is called in French and English Chronicles,—who sympathized with the Fatimides or Egyptian faction, was absent from Antioch as the Crusaders approached, having gone with the princes of Aleppo and Jerusalem, against Emessa, which was occupied by the opposite faction. On hearing the news of the Christians’ arrival, he speedily returned to Antioch, and realizing his danger, sent for aid in all directions, including even those foes against whom but the day before he had been arrayed in arms.

The Crusaders, after some debate, decided to attempt the siege of Antioch immediately, and took up their position around its walls, notwithstanding the fact that they had not enough men to invest them entirely. This was a siege in which, strange to say, the besiegers suffered infinitely more than the besieged. Antioch was well provisioned, while the country round about had been so thoroughly pillaged and laid waste, that it was with extreme difficulty that the Christians could obtain the necessities of life. Added to this was the discomfort of a rainy season, so long con-

Rooster of the Japanese Painter Young Man of Character

Bishop Tihamer Toth

From Bishop Tihamer Toth’s Young Man of Character

According to a Japanese legend a rich merchant once placed an interesting order with a painter. The painting had to display a rooster, but that in the most perfect manner. Having placed the order, the merchant waited for many years in vain. Finally, tired of waiting he went to visit the painter to find out how the picture was progressing. There was no sign of the painting. However, the painter asked the merchant to take a seat, started painting and in a quarter of an hour he produced the picture of the rooster. Impeccable masterpiece! The merchant was elated. However, when it came to paying, the merchant was extremely surprised at the enormous amount of money that the painter asked for this work of fifteen minutes and loudly protested. The painter calmly pointed to a huge pile of drawings each depicting a rooster and said: “For three years I have been painting roosters to gain the facility to paint a perfect rooster. I now expect to be paid for this long practice.” The merchant paid willingly.

Similar is the case of the training of our will. If it is our desire that our will be always obedient and perfectly carry out the good planned out by our intellect, then we need constant practice lasting decades. With the same patience the painter uses to put on the canvas the picture that already exists in his soul, we have to work on the shaping of our character.

But we will not be overwhelmed by this task. The painter also found that the next picture was easier than the previous one, and the last one took only a quarter of an hour to produce. Beginning is the hardest even in the realm of self-education. The longer you practice the good, the easier it gets. I remember when I was a student how difficult I found exercises on the still rings. I did not have the strength for the crosses. For many months I struggled building up my strength. Eventually I learned them and got quite good at them.

Similar is the case with the spiritual life: the first time it is very hard, it costs you a great deal of struggle, but the tenth time it is already quite easy. So practice every day, and then you will have a strong will. Learn to renounce things that are permitted. In the morning, jump out of bed saying: “A little self-conquest!” If your tooth is aching, grit your teeth, do not complain but say to yourself: “A little self-conquest!” You are reading a very interesting book. Close it at the most interesting part: “A little self-conquest!” You are hungry like a wolf. Do not touch your food for a few minutes: “A little self-conquest!” You can practice on thousands and thousands of similar small things. And the more you remain the master in little things, the more easily you will become the master in important things.

Let us look at an example in detail. Your parents left home, and you promised to guard the house in their absence, and you also have a lot of homework to do. Five minutes later Johnny shows up at the door: “Come on, Frank, here are the boys, let us go and play ball!” It is a beautiful sunny afternoon outside, and inside you are facing a complex algebra problem. Now the struggle starts: shall I say yes or no? I promised to stay home and guard the house. But the boys will mock me that I have spoiled their game. It would be so good to go and play, but my parents will scold me. What if I come back early and they will never know? But then what happens to the algebra problem? Tomorrow in class I could say that I was absent-minded and left my notes at home. But doing so is not honest... So the arguments swirl pro and con. The boys are getting impatient. Finally you say bravely: “Forgive me, but today playing for me is impossible...” The boys depart, and you are looking after them sadly. But you feel the satisfaction of having done your duty honorably. And if you have to do this again, the same decision will be easier the second or the third time, and eventually it will be the most natural thing for you to do the right thing without hesitation. Painting the later roosters came quite easy to the Japanese painter also.

You will have to strive for acquiring an ever-present ability to practice the good that never hesitates nor ever needs to deliberate. When you do not any more have to weigh which road to choose before acting, but you will choose the good routinely as a habit acquired by long practice, and you will shun evil swiftly and spontaneously, then life is paying you back for your long preparations. Life is not paying you with money; it is paying you with the facility with which you are able to act, easily and gladly, corresponding to your noble principles, that is to say you are now a “young man of character.”

tinued that their very tents rotted over their heads. As a natural consequence of this state of things, a frightful epidemic broke out, which reduced their numbers with startling rapidity, and enfeebled and discouraged those who were left alive. It was not until spring returned, and better weather came, that anything like energy showed itself among the besiegers.

In all this trouble Godfrey bore himself like a Christian hero, suffering patiently with the others, and signaling himself by deeds of valour and courage. One of his exhibitions of strength and bravery is reported in more than one of the old chronicles. A fleet of Genoese and Pisans having anchored in the port of St. Simon, the Crusaders, in all haste and joy, sent a body of men to receive the provisions and news that they brought, and to escort back to Antioch the sailors and carpenters who were to assist them in constructing besieging engines. As the little body of men returned, it was attacked and routed by a party of Saracens, who were lying in wait for them. Godfrey, hearing of the engagement, hastened to the spot with a large detachment of men. Bagi Sijan, who was standing on one of the towers of Antioch, rejoicing over the defeat of the Christians, seeing his own men, in turn, in danger, sent a party out from the town to their assistance. The mêlée became general, and the fighting desperate on both sides. The Christian princes smote prodigious blows, and performed wonderful deeds of valour. Robert of Normandy split the head of one of his opponents to the shoulder with a single stroke, but Godfrey surpassed even that. A huge Saracen engaged with him, and shivered his shield with the first blow.

Godfrey, rising in his stirrups, calmly cut his adversary in two across the middle with one stroke, so that the upper half of the man fell to the ground, leaving the lower half still sitting on the horse.

Thus for months the Crusaders invested Antioch, and at the end of this time would have been no nearer accomplishing their purpose than at the beginning, had not one Emir Feirus, as William of Tyre calls him, a renegade Armenian of wealth and influence in Antioch, turned traitor, and delivered the city into their hands, on condition that Bohemond of Tarentum should be its prince and ruler. Once inside the walls, the Christians, infuriated by the long resistance, and exasperated by their own sufferings, slaughtered the greater part of the inhabitants, young and old indiscriminately, as many as six thousand perishing in a single night. But Godfrey and the other princes had but a short time to exult over their success. It will be remembered that Bagi-Sijan at the commencement of the siege sent to all the great Mahomedan princes for aid. To his appeal they did not turn a deaf ear; and only three days after the Christians entered Antioch, on the 6th of June, Kerboga, prince of Mosul, presented himself before its gates, with an army estimated variously at from 300,000 to 600,000 men, and the besiegers became in turn the besieged. On the horrors of that siege it is difficult to dwell. It is enough to say, that after being shut up three weeks in a city stripped of provisions and stores of every kind, the Crusaders, rendered desperate by famine and misery, marched out against Kerboga and his army—headed by Godfrey and Tancred, and their fellow peers—decided to die by the sword rather than by disease and hunger. Inspired by their necessities, and uplifted by their religious faith, the weak and enfeebled men fought as only desperate men can fight, and were rewarded by complete victory. They remained masters of the field, while the vast army of Kerboga was scattered to the four winds of heaven. This battle was the end of any effective opposition to the onward march of the Crusaders; but the hardships that they had endured seemed for the time to have quenched the ardour of the leaders of the army, for it was not until late in the following winter, after the repeated solicitations of the common people, that the princes and great barons could be persuaded to leave their private expeditions against adjacent cities, and start on their way towards Jerusalem. Godfrey, Eustache, and Robert of Flanders did not get under way until spring.

Their route lay along the sea now, through such a beautiful and fertile country, that notwithstanding the murmurs of the common people, who were impatient to reach their journey's end, the leaders could not resist the temptation to stop and lay siege to some of the wealthy towns near by. Godfrey besieged Gibel, while Raymond of Toulouse attacked Archas. In this way some time was consumed, so that it was not until the end of May that the forces were all united again, this time, however, with a firm determination to let nothing hinder them from proceeding directly to Jerusalem.

Sickness and war had made terrible havoc among their number, so that of the hundreds of thousands who had started on this undertaking, scarce fifty thousand were now left. The excitement was tremendous as they approached the Holy City.

The last night, many of the men, unable to restrain their impatience, marched the whole night through, and at daybreak, June 10th, 1099, saw the walls and towers of Jerusalem rise up before them. Never before or since, in the history of the world, probably, has a scene of such intense emotion, on so large a scale, been seen, or have such transports of joy and reverence been witnessed. Strong, stalwart men, who had endured untold suffering and privations to behold this sight, sobbed aloud; some cast themselves upon their knees in prayer; others kissed the earth on which they stood, in an ecstasy of rejoicing.

The very next day energetic preparations were made for the assault of the city. To each of the princes was assigned a portion of the walls, to invest. Godfrey, with his brother Eustache and his cousin Baldwin du Bourg, occupied the north-west side, between the gate of Damascus and the gate of Jaffa, which included the spot most precious to them all, the enclosure of Mount Calvary. The Saracens—well provisioned, and thoroughly prepared for a long siege—had not only stripped the country around of everything eatable, but had filled up all the wells and cisterns for a long distance, so that in a few days the besiegers suffered both from hunger and thirst. Nothing daunted, they continued their siege with all the fire of religious enthusiasts; and recognizing the fact that their unaided strength could not accomplish their purpose, they set themselves systematically and patiently about building the necessary engines for making a decisive attack. For weeks they laboured untiringly, until at length everything that the military science of the time could devise, with the limited means and material at their disposal, was ready. On Thursday, July the 14th, the assault was commenced. For two days the conflict was terrible; both sides fought with the energy of desperation, until late on Friday afternoon, when the two brothers Lethold and Engelbert of Tournai, followed by Godfrey of Bouillon, set foot upon the walls of Jerusalem. In an incredibly short space of time Godfrey and his men were down in the city, and the gates were thrown open. The Crusaders massacred their enemies without mercy, and blood ran in torrents to their knees in the street.

But Godfrey, with his deep religious sentiment, felt that prayer rather than bloodshed befitted their first hours in Jerusalem, and set the example to the others by withdrawing from the carnage, and going barefooted, clad simply in a clean linen garment, to the sepulchre of our Lord, to return thanks that He had thus allowed them to accomplish their pilgrimage and fulfil their vows. Godfrey was followed by all; weapons and bloody garments were laid aside, and barefooted, with heads reverently uncovered, all marched to the Church of the Resurrection, weeping tears of joy, praying and singing songs of penitence and rejoicing.

The victory now obtained was complete, but there was no time to sit idly, or even to rest after their long labours. The city was cleared of its dead; and after that, the first care of the Crusaders was to organize a Christian government, and above all to choose a fitting ruler, a man capable of leading them in war, and of controlling and guiding them in peace. After due deliberation and careful inquiry into the character and ability of each of the great barons, on July 23rd they elected Godfrey of Bouillon king of Jerusalem, and would have proceeded immediately to crown him, had not that pious and reverential prince unconditionally refused the honour. Their leader and duke he was willing to be, “but God forbid,” said he, “that I should be crowned with a crown of gold, where my Saviour bore a crown of thorns.” At least, this is the report of the deliberations and their result, as given by William of Tyre, who followed Albert of Aix. According to Raymond of Agiles, the crown was first offered to Raymond of Toulouse, who refused it in the words here attributed to Godfrey. Other authorities state that the crown was also offered to Robert of Normandy, who in turn refused it, and that then the choice fell upon Godfrey of Bouillon. Whether this be true or not, it is certain that the choice once made, all were unanimously pleased and contented with it; the common people, especially, regarded it as the result of an inspiration from heaven. Little opportunity was offered for festivities in honour of the new king, as an Egyptian army, 300,000 strong, under the Emir Afdal, was advancing against them. So confident of victory were the Moslems, that they were even bringing with them, it was reported, ropes or chains with which to bind their prisoners. At the moment that Godfrey took command of the little army of the Crusaders, the enemy were already traversing Gaza, the ancient land of the Philistines. He sent immediately for Tancred and Eustache, who were away in Naplouse, and prepared to go out against the foe, as he saw that to allow themselves to be besieged in Jerusalem would only repeat the horrors of Antioch. At first, Robert of Normandy and Raymond of Toulouse refused to join the outgoing troops, but soon, seeing the imminent danger that threatened them, yielded, and united with the others. The two armies met near Askalon, Godfrey at the head of scarce 20,000 men. But such was their enthusiasm and bravery that nothing could withstand them, and the vast army of Afdal was gloriously routed. This battle firmly established the Latins in Palestine; and the great princes, feeling that they had fulfilled their vows, started one after another for home, leaving Godfrey with a few thousand men to solve the difficult problem of governing, protecting, and increasing his newly-founded domain.

Of the events of Godfrey's reign there is but little to say. He ruled wisely, strengthening himself in every possible way, and making good laws both for the governing and the governed. He died after one short year of kingship on July 18, 1100, and was buried on Mount Calvary, near the Saviour whom, in life, he had striven with reverence and single-heartedness to serve. Tradition gives us more than one version of the cause of his death. One authority tells us that he died from eating some poisoned fruit, presented by the neighbouring Emir of Cæsarea; another states that he was poisoned by Dagobert, the new bishop of Jerusalem; but neither of these two stories seems to be any more reliable than the quartan-fever legend already mentioned.

Thus perished, in the flower of his age, the man who above all others was the leading figure in the great religious movements of the 11th and 12th centuries.

Remigration According to St Thomas Aquinas

How Would The Angelic Doctor Judge It?

Quentin Douté

Would St Thomas approve or disapprove of the Remigration policy? Our author M Douté gives his best guess of the Angelic Doctor's thoughts.

The presence of foreigners greatly corrupts the morals of citizens," according to the teaching of Aristotle in his Politics, "because it must necessarily happen that foreigners raised under different laws and customs will in many respects act differently from what the customs of the citizens require. As a result, while citizens are led by example to act in a similar manner, social life is disturbed."

Thus speaks Saint Thomas Aquinas in his De Regno, a true synthesis of Thomistic political philosophy. It was already estimated in 2011 (15 years ago!) that 23% of the French population was of foreign origin over one, two, or three generations. In 2016, 39% of births were of extra-European origin; this figure rose to 56.35% in the southeast (PACA and Corsica) and 73.56% in the Île-de-France region. In Seine-Saint-Denis, as early as 2008 (18 years ago!), 75% of residents aged 18 to 50 were immigrants or children of immigrants (12% Europeans, 63% extra-Europeans): one can imagine what the situation is today... Every day, current events continue to confirm the observation made by Aristotle and Saint Thomas many centuries ago.

While Pope Leo XIV, as a worthy successor to Francis, continually preaches in favor of mass immigration, Catholics have a duty to work for the common good of their nations and not allow them to be overwhelmed by this veritable invasion. Not content with occupying our territory, these foreigners are also being naturalized on a massive scale. On this subject, Saint Thomas Aquinas teaches in his Summa Theologica regarding the policy of the ancient Kingdom of Israel toward foreigners (IIa Ia, q. 105 art. 3):

"The third case is that of foreigners who desired to be received into full communion of life and worship with the people. In their regard, certain formalities were observed, and admission to citizenship was not immediate. Likewise, according to Aristotle, it was a rule among certain nations to reserve citizenship for those whose grandfather, or even great-grandfather, had resided in the city. This is understandable because of the many inconveniences caused by the premature participation of foreigners in public affairs if, before becoming firmly attached to the people, they were to undertake actions against them. Therefore, according to the provisions of the law, certain nations more or less connected with the Jews, such as the Egyptians among whom they had been born and raised, and the Edomites descended from Esau, Jacob's brother, were admitted into the community of the people in the third generation. Others, however, who had shown hostility toward the Jews, such as the descendants of Ammon and Moab, were never admitted."

After noting that, on the spiritual plane, one should work for the salvation of all people regardless of their nation, the Angelic Doctor continues:

"But in temporal matters, concerning political society, one did not immediately admit every newcomer, for the reason already given. Some were admitted in the third generation: the Egyptians and the Edomites. Others—the Moabites, Am-monites, and Amalekites—were excluded perpetually, in abhorrence of their past crime. For just as an individual bears the penalty of the fault he has committed, so that others, intimidated by the example, may cease doing evil, so too a nation or a city may be punished for a sin so that others may refrain from imitating it. Nevertheless, by individual dispensation, a particular person could, on account of some outstanding deed, be incorporated into the people. Thus we read in Judith (14:6) that Achior, leader of the Ammonites, was incorporated into the people of Israel, together with all his descendants."

This is a teaching that should be recalled particularly today, much more so than in the thirteenth century. Not only must we not allow mass immigration to disturb public peace and disfigure our nation, but it is even our duty to choose carefully and intelligently the foreigners who wish to settle on our territory.

On this particularly sensitive issue, one must reject pure demagoguery ("zero immigration," fixation on Islam) and propose genuine solutions favorable to the common good:

First, Remigration

France has undergone a veritable migratory invasion in recent decades, as shown by the statistics cited above. It can avoid the "great replacement" of its native population by foreigners only through concrete measures (revocation of nationality for dual citizens, non-renewal of visas, expulsion of illegal immigrants, elimination of benefits for foreigners) aimed at encouraging the departure of a large portion of the population of immigrant origin.

Next, Selective Immigration

In the 1930s, it was said that it was better to establish offices of the National Immigration Office "in Milan rather than in Istanbul." This is simply common sense and largely aligns with the Old Testament practices recalled by Saint Thomas Aquinas. Likewise, in 1945, the High Committee on Population and the Family planned to admit 50% immigrants of Nordic origin (Germans, Belgians, etc.), 30% of Mediterranean origin (Italians, Spaniards, Algerians, etc.), and 20% of Slavic origin, while those from Asia or sub-Saharan Africa were to be accepted only on a case-by-case basis. Today, the priority should be to favor immigrants coming from peoples who are culturally, ethnically, and religiously close to French identity. One must also take into account, like the ancient Hebrews, past and present relations with different peoples. Thus, while in 1945 Algerians enjoyed a positive image because they came from French territory and had behaved well during the two world wars, they have become far less assimilable after more than 60 years of National Liberation Front rule, which has continually instilled hatred of France in them. It is hardly reasonable to have, as is currently the case, more than two million of them on our territory.

Finally, Reform of Naturalization

Birthright citizenship, this absurdity that consists in turning a calf born in a stable into a horse, must be abolished. Furthermore, as Saint Thomas Aquinas emphasized, it is more prudent not to naturalize foreigners during the first generation present on French soil. When naturalization occurs in the second or third generation—especially if intermarriage with French natives has occurred in the meantime—it corresponds much more closely to reality.

St Thomas was not Obese

See The Evidence for Yourself

Cordithicus

From an anonymous Substacker: Cordithicus. We present his playful article debunking the urban legend that St Thomas Aquinas was intemperate with his food. The evidence is conclusive, but are you brave enough to broach this topic with friends and family during the next Feast of Corpus Christi?

Introduction

There seems to be a popular description of St. Thomas Aquinas that posits he was an obese man, indicating some lacking in the virtue of temperance with food. I have seen this claim from both atheists, seeking to dampen the reputation of the great saint, and even from the Dominican friars themselves:

“Our brother, the Dumb Ox!” by Br. Lawrence Lew O.P.

So, his mentor, St Albert the Great, famously called him a ‘dumb ox’, on account of both his size, we suppose, and also of his quietness in class. Later in his life, a Cistercian priest commented that Thomas was “large and heavy and had a bald forehead”, and indeed, Thomas’ own student, Remigio of Florence, says that he was “very fat”. St Thomas’ biographer, Tocco, also mentions that he was “large in body” with a “large head”, and adds that he had thin blonde hair. This physical characteristic and his height are both thought to be derived from his noble Norman ancestry.

It seems that this description is also in part to the biography done by G.K. Chesterton which includes some more inflammatory descriptions:

G.K. Chesterton, St. Thomas Aquinas - St. Francis of Assisi (In 1 Volume), pg. 112

St. Thomas was of a certain type, which is not so much common in Italy, as common to uncommon Italians. His bulk made it easy to regard him humorously as the sort of walking wine-barrel, common in the comedies of many nations; he joked about it himself. It may be that he, and not some irritated partisan of the Augustinian or Arabian parties, was responsible for the sublime exaggeration that a crescent was cut out of the dinner-table to allow him to sit down. It is quite certain that it was an exaggeration; and that his stature was more remarked than his stoutness; but, above all, that his head was quite powerful enough to dominate his body. And his head was of a very real and recognizable type, to judge by the traditional portraits and the personal descriptions.

However, when studying the earliest accounts of St. Thomas Aquinas, it seems that this size was not that of mere fatness, but great strength. In this article, I want to show some of the earliest ever depictions of St. Thomas as seen in illuminated manuscripts to see what he really looked like.

William of Tocco

First, it would do us well to see what Br. William of Tocco said about the appearance of St. Thomas. This work, “The Life of St. Thomas Aquinas,” was written in 1319 by a friar who sought to help the papal process in canonizing his friarly brother. He used many early sources including family members, friends, and students who knew St. Thomas personally. This is taken from Chapter 38 of the described book:

On the natural constitution of the doctor’s body, which corresponded to the interior virtue of his mind.

It is also said, with respect to the natural constitution of our doctor’s body, that he was of a tall stature and erect bearing, and this uprightness corresponded well to the state of his soul. His skin color was a wheaten brown, which also served to indicate his temperate disposition. His head, which was somewhat bald, was of a great size, since the perfections of the sensitive powers that are subject to reason require well-formed organs. His body was of the most sensitive constitution even as his mind was marked by the subtlety of his intellect. Whenever he was given to exert himself in various acts of bodily strength, Thomas showed himself a robust and virile man. Likewise, owing to his pious humility, Thomas never despised anything common, nor, by the strength of his mind, did he fear anything that caused others terror, placing his confidence always in the divine assistance. With respect to the latter, it is said that, while he was departing from Paris, he was caught by a terrible tempest while traveling by sea; when even the sailors feared for their lives, Thomas remained completely unafraid for the duration of the storm. Through all the terrors of wind, lightning, and tempest, fortifying himself with the sign of the Cross as though it were a shield set against his enemies, Thomas would say: “God came in the flesh; God died for us.” By all of this, it seems that God had fashioned his body as the noblest of instruments, which Thomas always held subservient to acts of virtue and which he never permitted to contravene the judgment of reason.

Another miraculous event that is related to this day about our doctor is astonishing both for the action and the deliberation that it displays. While Thomas was traveling in a small ship with many companions from his Order, the seamen were sailing against the current of the river, while some of them were dragging the ship with ropes from the bank outside with great difficulty. Sighing to his companions, blessed Thomas said to them: “The human race suffers from such a lack of power that this ship can hardly be drawn onward by several men together, when it would have obeyed the command of a single man if mankind had submitted to his God from the beginning.” After a little time had passed and the sailors were completely wearied from their labor, the saint had pity on them and said to his companions: “Let us go down and help these sailors a little.” Once they had descended, it happened that the master easily drew the ship along for some distance by himself, even though many sailors heaving together could scarcely make it budge. Marveling at this incredible prodigy, his companions then began to pull the ship with their master. This miracle indeed bears witness to the sanctity of this man, who never willfully offended his Creator after taking flesh in his mother’s womb. And it was fitting that a man who so innocently held his body in obedience should have been so readily obeyed by another creature in this miracle.

This description is far from the obese and ugly ones we see made popular today in art. Indeed, all early accounts describe him as both large and tall, but also very naturally strong. Anyone who has grown up around such men would know that to reduce such a description to just “fat” or “obese” would be entirely inaccurate. Even more blasphemous is the legend about having to cut a half-circle into a table so he could sit at it.

Preliminary Notes

However, these descriptions are only as good as our imagination. Thus, I want to go through a collected array of early manuscripts that include images of the Angelic Doctor. Before doing so, I would like to make a few notes about my research methodology.

This project has taken me quite a long time to do. I have dug through almost every single St. Thomas-related manuscript in the Municipal Library as well as dozens of others in the Vatican Library. For this article, I will be generally only including images of St. Thomas from manuscripts that meet the following standards:

1. The document must be one of (or a copy of) St. Thomas Aquinas’ works.
2. The document must explicitly mention St. Thomas Aquinas by name in the context of the manuscript.
3. The image must, beyond reasonable doubt, be of St. Thomas Aquinas as opposed to some other Dominican friar.

Should I have to deviate from one or more of these standards, I will make that known. It’s important to realize how hard it is to accurately date manuscripts like this. As a result, I will be using the dates given by the official libraries that house them. If a dating on a manuscript is too broad and needs, in light of historical data, to be refined, I will make known why I have changed it and what the original dating was. Sometimes the library will merely say it was “13th century” which is quite broad since St. Thomas was only born in 1225, which means you could easily put a start to the image much later than that.

Additionally, take note of how the prior descriptions of St. Thomas line up with these manuscripts. You will notice the descriptions of his great stature and size of his head are quite accurate. Additionally, many show him to have blonde hair which coincides with Br. Tocco’s account as well.

Lastly, all of these will be in order from earliest to latest, but I will not be including some of the more famous depictions of him. In fact, I am in the process of acquiring a digital scan of an image that is being kept at Cambridge University and is not public yet:

Anthi Andronikou, Italy, Cyprus, and Artistic Exchange in the Medieval Mediterranean, Appendix 3, pg. 324

The earliest extant portrait of Aquinas is incorporated in a manuscript containing his Summa theologia, produced in Rome during the last quarter of the thirteenth century. Saint Thomas is illustrated in the initial Q (fol. 5 r), en buste, against a starry blue background. He wears a black habit, and his pointed cowl roughly covers his head. In his left hand, he holds a book; with his right hand, he points. Aquinas is depicted at a relatively young age, without a halo.

Should that work out, I’ll send it in another article. Regardless, some of the images I will share date to about that same time if not earlier than what Anthi Andronikou describes since St. Thomas only wrote his Summa Theologica after 1265.

The Manuscript Evidence

Starting off are all the depictions of St. Thomas from the 13th century, possibly drawn while he was alive, if not shortly after he died, but most certainly before canonization. I’ll then move onto depictions that are generally from the early 14th century and end it there. After this date range, the artistic freedom begins to creep in. When looking at these dates, remember that St. Thomas lived from 1225 to 1274. This should help contextualize their dating in your mind.

DATE: 1252 - 1300 A.D.

The dating on this image is merely put as the 13th century, however because it is a copy of

St. Thomas’ commentary on the Sentences, a work that he started in 1252, I feel confident in placing it after that date at the earliest. It shows St. Thomas teaching a group of secular clerics.

Included in this manuscript is this, quite funny, sketch of a friar. While I cannot absolutely confirm if it is a rough drawing of the Angelic Doctor, it’s worth mentioning. Included are many other drawings of animals and friars and, while I won’t be putting them here since I can’t confirm if they are of St. Thomas.

DATE: 1260 - 1300 A.D.

This image depicts St. Thomas meeting with Pope Urban IV, as described in the Latin to the picture’s right. You will soon notice a trend with this duo being a common theme. However, it does help us in dating these manuscripts as Pope Urban IV was pope from 1261-1264. This means that any drawing of such an event is after this date range. Sadly, St. Thomas Aquinas’ face has been damaged, but we can still see some faint features.

DATE: 1260 - 1300 A.D.

Again, Pope Urban IV and St. Thomas are seen together and, in reading the Latin, the work (Saint Thomas Aquinas’s Catena Aurea on the Gospels of Matthew and Mark) appears to be dedicated to this pontiff.

DATE: 1265 - 1281 A.D.

This is a drawing of St. Thomas from notes taken during a lecture while St. Thomas was teaching. In fact, this manuscript is the only known evidence of his teaching in the new Dominican stadium provinciale of Santa Sabina, Rome. Lincoln College states, "The major initial E is historiated with the Dominican author, seated, his right hand raised in a teaching posture and his left hand behind a book open in his lap. His hood half covers his tonsure. The initial is plain blue with white modelling, foliated in orange at the upper and lower terminals, and is boxed on a pale rose ground."

Giving this drawing as much criticism as it is due, if it isn't a drawing of St. Thomas while he was alive, it would at least be just a few years after his death. Lastly, take note of the brown habit he is wearing. This is likely due to discoloration over time and will be a somewhat common occurrence in many of the medieval drawings of the Dominicans.

For all the manuscripts from 1265 - 1300, please note that this is a date change by me. This is because they were originally dated "13th century" and are all works that he did at the Santa Sabina after 1265.

DATE: 1265 - 1300 A.D.

Here St. Thomas is teaching or chanting at a pulpit. It seems he has a mixed crowd of both secular clerics and Dominican brothers.

DATE:

1265 - 1300 A.D.

I am only moderately confident that this is St. Thomas since all I have for context is that it is one of his works and it doesn't mention him by name.

However, it seems to be a friar educating a cleric, so I will list it regardless.

DATE: 1276 - 1325 A.D.

Sadly, the digitized manuscript is quite blurry on this one. However, we can still clearly make out

St. Thomas teaching some secular clerics (wearing their red and blue) with the Latin "The Summa of Theology, composed by Brother Thomas Aquinas of the Order of Friars Preachers, First Book" written in red above him.

DATE: 1290 - 1310 A.D.

I have yet to figure out what Mary and Jesus are holding.

DATE: 1290 - 1325 A.D.

Some scholars have preferred a later date range of 1310-1325, but that still makes it incredibly early. There is a clear artistic difference in the drawing of this manuscript compared to others, yet his appearance seems to still be consistent.

The Latin next to this image reads: "Here begins the Summa of Theology of Brother Thomas Aquinas, a man of Catholic learning. Brother William of Tocco, his companion, pupil, devoted friend, and intimate associate, has related [these things]." This could be a picture of Brother Tocco teaching other brothers about St. Thomas, but I am quite confident that Brother Tocco would rather have his "intimate associate" depicted instead.

DATE: 1323 - 1400 A.D.

This image comes from a sung antiphoner about St. Thomas' feast day. You can see he is lecturing four Dominicans and two laymen while a dove flies nearby. This manuscript comes from multiple leaflet cuttings that were sold, so finding the original apart from the provided link may prove difficult.

DATE: 14th century A.D.

They could be earlier than the ones cited before, but I will err on the side of skepticism. Here St. Thomas is handling a book with an Angel. This is from a copy of his Summa Theologiae (Pars Tertia).

DATE: 14th century A.D.

the library, "Thomas Aquinas; Raynaldus (Reginald) of Piperno, Commentary on the Gospel of John" which means it is likely depicting these two men.

DATE: 14th century A.D.

composed by Brother Thomas Aquinas of the Order of Preachers." Thus, we see St. Thomas in his signature pointing position as he educates his brothers. I will note that this describes St. Thomas as "brother" not "saint" so I personally believe this to be prior to his canonization date in 1323. Although, it is not uncommon for Dominicans to still refer to their canonized friars as "brothers."

Now, I know I was going to limit myself to the 14th century, but for fun I wanted to keep this since I found it cool. The red lettering above it reads, "Ci commence l'histoire de la vie de saint Thomas d'Aquin, docteur" or "Here begins the history of Saint Thomas Aquinas, Doctor."

Conclusion

Well, this concludes probably one of the biggest projects I've done. I'm sure there are more depictions of St. Thomas Aquinas out there and, if I find them, I'll be sure to send them out or update this article. I have more images that are not in this article but are in my original YouTube video, go check that out.

Hopefully my point, however, is made. Namely, that St. Thomas was not an obese glutton. Rather, he was a tall, strong, man who loved Jesus Christ and contributed more knowledge to the Church than any other philosopher who has lived.

The Science of Temptation

Advertising: a Modern Scourge

Carol Robinson

From Integrity Magazine. Few could even imagine a world without advertising. But it was ours once, and it can be ours again. In the language of game-theory, it is said that advertising is a prisoner's dilemma. If everyone acts according to their personal incentive, everyone advertises and so everyone suffers. Anyone choosing to opt-out is punished (from their loss of sales), while those who advertise are rewarded. The result? A never-ending encroachment of billboards, pop-ups, and branded stationary. The solution? An institution charged with the cultivation of the common good, and enforcing strict bans and regulation on the practice of advertising. What is this institution? The State. Whose charge is it? Laymen's.

The phenomenon of modern advertising rests increasingly on a coherent set of underlying principles which together form the Science of Temptation. As a leading advertising man once put it: "Our business is to get people to buy things they don't need, don't want and can't afford." Books on advertising try to explain how this is done in a scientific manner. They could be much more exact and comprehensive about their explanations if they would read St. Thomas Aquinas. The art of temptation is not new. The novelty lies in men's considering it honorable.

The Devil's Psychology

Unmoral man is an abstraction. St. Thomas says that anything we do, in the concrete, is either good or bad, not neutral. Walking is neither good nor bad, considered in itself, but any particular walk takes on moral color from its destination and circumstances. Similarly, there is no such thing as an unmoral psychology. Rational Psychology, which merely describes what the will is like, what the intellect is like and so forth, can only exist as an abstract study. Let psychology deal with cases and it enters the moral realm, either directly or indirectly. The intellect understands—but does it understand truly or not? The will chooses, but rightly or wrongly? The passions operate, but are they in accordance with right reason, or are they swaying the reason because they are out of control?

A charming 19th century advert for hot-chocolate. It is not long after do we have the 'arms race' of advertising kick into overdrive.

Theology (first moral, and then ascetical and mystical) analyzes the progressive workings of the soul on its way upward to God. Incidental to this it discusses the temptations, the vices and deceptions to which the soul is liable, and which would deflect it from its proper course. Today it has been found profitable to categorize these temptations, not, strangely enough, so that they might be avoided, but that they might be exploited. The knowledge of man's tendencies to vice is used to pull him toward indulgence rather than away from the danger. This Devil's Psychology which forms the basis for modern advertising we shall call the Science of Temptation.

There is only one perfection suitable to our nature. Our reason must be subject to God, and our lower nature (emotional and carnal) brought under the subjection of reason. The main effort of our lives should be directed to the establishment of this hierarchical order in ourselves. It is not easy. Because we are both body and soul there is an inevitable struggle between the flesh and the spirit. Because of Original (and subsequent) Sin there is also a struggle in the soul itself, against the spiritual sins such as pride, envy, malice and rancor. With the help of grace, good will and long hard work, we can hope finally to harmonize our nature under God's jurisdiction.

The Science of Temptation is calculated not to heal the wounds in our nature, but to exploit them. It sets passion against reason, the flesh against the spirit, and even creates disorder in the purely spiritual part of man. Whatever may be the immediate excuse for exploiting man's weaknesses (in the case of advertising it is profit), it is evident that the natural end of the Science of Temptation itself is precisely the damnation of souls. That is why it is called accurately "The Devil's Psychology."

What Advertising Is

Most people who defend advertising do it according to their own definition. This is not legitimate. They cannot define advertising as it pleases them, but must consider the phenomenon as it exists. It is not an activity that can be traced back to Ancient Egypt, but a business which scarcely antedates the year 1900. It is bound up integrally with a bad economic system and a godless philosophy.

Many would like to hold that advertising is just a technique, neither good nor bad in itself but capable of being used for good or bad ends. They imply that it is only a matter of time before advertising will be made to serve man's spiritual and material perfection. This is not true. We will show that it cannot be instrumental in man's true progress. Let us first plan an advertising campaign directed to good spiritual ends. Let us take the best end, the salvation of souls.

It is easy to imagine a very lively series of advertisements for the salvation-of-souls campaign. Just as advertisers stress the importance of repetition, so masters of the spiritual life tell us that thinking often on death serves to keep people concentrating on their last end. Therefore, we should plan the first several advertisements on the death, decay and damnation theme, and run them during Lent. The opening ad would present simply the thesis: "Remember man that thou art dust, and unto dust thou shalt return!" This would be featured on billboards throughout the nation, with a picture of a young man on one side and a new grave on the other. It would be a spot advertisement on the coast-to-coast radio on Ash Wednesday. The following ad would show damned souls enduring the torments of hell. Then there would be an accusatory one: "Are you sure you will be alive tomorrow?" followed by a statistical variation, "386 of you will die during the night," ending up with a funeral scene and the reminder that "This might be you!"

It would be well to follow the death series with something more cheerful, say a series on beatitude (There's no cancer in heaven! San Moritz is beautiful, but not half so lovely as paradise! He is only a street cleaner here but he will have a high place in the hereafter!). Then a series on the virtues would be useful (Perseverance does it! You too can be patient! Have you examined your conscience yet today?).

But why go on? We know it couldn't happen. The reason it couldn't happen is that it would entail a constant and enormous financial drain on whoever chose to promote it. Advertising spiritually good things, on which it is impossible by their nature to realize a dollar-and-cents return, is like walking up a down escalator. It is a constant drain on our energy, physical or financial, which can only end in exhaustion. It is possible to run a religious advertisement now and again, just as we can walk up a down escalator awhile. But it does not prove that advertising is good, or neutral, if at great sacrifice its paraphernalia can be turned to an occasional good use. (As witness the excellent "ads" being run by the Knights of Columbus; good in themselves, but again, going against the grain of the advertising business.) Its normal, natural use doesn't involve sacrifice at all, but only rewards. Advertising men, agencies, books, courses and clubs exist in virtue of the advertising that pays. If we want to know the true nature of advertising, this is where we must look. This real advertising has as its reason for being the creation of demands for material goods. To put it theologically, advertising exists to incite concupiscence (to arouse desire for material things). If we want to know whether advertising is moral or not, we have to examine the morality of inciting concupiscence.

The American Way of Life

We have a higher standard of living here in America than is to be found anywhere else in the world. This high standard is owing in considerable measure to advertising. Therefore, we ought to say nothing against advertising. This is the way the argument runs. What is there in it?

It is true that we have the highest standard of living in the world if you measure it by material luxuries. We do not have the highest moral standard, the highest spiritual standard, or the highest cultural standard! We do not even have the highest material standard as judged by fundamentals; nor the highest standard of health (positively measured), or of beauty in natural and architectural surroundings, or of air, light, and space. But we have the highest standard in convenience, luxury, ease: bathtubs, radios and Bendixes.

It is true, too, that advertising is a strong auxiliary to our standard of living, although it is not the sole influence. To hear some people talk, bathtubs would never have got around without advertising men. But good things, and especially necessary things, can spread without benefit of the copywriter, and in the days when shopkeepers were responsible socially, we could use their knowledge and integrity in lieu of a brand name as guide to quality—not that brand names are guides to quality.

"It is not an activity that can be traced back to Ancient Egypt, but a business which scarcely antedates the year 1900. It is bound up integrally with a bad economic system and a godless philosophy."

Advertising is not so much an adjunct to good living as it is to better and better living, as measured in luxuries. This is what is really meant by the American Way of Life: a bourgeois standard of comfort and ease, tending to infinity.

The key to the whole thing is that the standard tends to infinity. When we look through McCall's magazine where the ads are concentrated in categories, we are struck by this ever-preceding ideal. Page after page pictures table delicacies, each more luscious than the one before, with the editorial copy planned and so interspersed as to heighten the appeal of the ads. The whole is an almost overwhelming temptation to gluttony, of both the quantity and quality sorts. Eat more and more, and better and better, it says. Naturally none of the copywriters says, "Worship your belly," nor probably even thinks it. Yet this is the precise invitation that is given.

It is the same thing in the women's clothes section. How well is well-dressed? Here again it is a receding ideal, tending of itself to infinity. The extent and variety of an American woman's wardrobe is limited only by the accidental factor of the amount beyond which she can't manage to go in debt to buy more clothes.

Even houses now tend to be infinitely well furnished. No matter how good our kitchen is, it can always be better—either more convenient or more beautiful, or more in accordance with the later fashions.

With ease and comfort it is the same thing. The mattresses get softer and softer, the chairs get deeper and deeper, the cars ride smoother and smoother. Everything tends to be done by merely pressing a button.

All spiritual writers teach that the advance toward God, our goal, is marked by a progressive detachment from creatures. The spirit soars in proportion as it is freed from the tyranny of the body. We cannot do without material goods, but we must learn to be indifferent to them, to use them as though we used them not. The precise passion which we must war against is concupiscence, the desire for material things.

The essence of advertising, which is to incite concupiscence, is the antithesis of spiritual progress, which is marked in its beginning stages by the overcoming of concupiscence. In the spiritual life we cannot stand still. We either go up or down. Which way are we Americans going?

How Much Is Enough?

The ideal of infinite (or indefinite) progress is compatible with Christianity only insofar as it refers to spiritual progress. When infinity is attached to material things it becomes idolatry, which is strictly what our materialism has become. We do not just use material things. We worship them! It is therefore beside the point to argue that material things are good in themselves. Of course they are (most of them), but that does not justify a disordered regard for them.

We cannot love God too much, but we can be too well-dressed, too well-fed, have too much ease, too much comfort, too much money and too many possessions. Where do we draw the line between enough and too much?

It is possible really to determine a right measure of material things. We should live frugally according to our states of life. The mayor and the bootblack should live differently from each other, but not as differently as nowadays. (The manor house of medieval England was nicer, but not terribly much nicer, than the villager's cottage. The contrast between the vast estate and the mean tenement came with industrial capitalism.) Each should live frugally, now and again feasting for the glory of God, and sometimes fasting for the good of their souls.

The right measure is not mathematically exact, but it is an obtainable ideal. It is opposed diametrically to the ever-increasing standard of living which is the stock-in-trade of the modern advertiser.

The Devil's Harvest

We are so used to reflecting on our material progress that if this ideal of infinite material advance were to be taken from us it is hard to see how we would allocate our energies. What is there to do in the world if we are not busy harnessing the physical resources of the earth to man's use and pleasure?

God gives each man a certain talent which he can use in a variety of ways, though not in all ways. Because of the materialistic orientation of our civilization men have turned to the construction of skyscrapers the gifts which might have been used for building cathedrals; they have devised housing projects when they might have been designing homes. A director of a large corporation, with marvelous executive ability, singleness of purpose and austerity of life, might under other circumstances have made an excellent Father Abbot. What copywriter has not felt his talent ought to be turned to nobler ends?

If men had not so far forgotten their last end as to fall into idolatry, if they had set out to master themselves for God, instead of mastering the earth for their bodies' sakes, would it have made so very much difference? Cathedrals and systems of theology, books about the spiritual life, and liturgical vestments have their just measure too, and are subordinate to spiritual ends. The real work of the world is the sanctification of souls. Each generation might have been busy (as the humanists say so glibly) making the world a better place to live in. If better were taken to mean "easier to save our souls in," we would have now quite a different world. But more than that, each generation might have practiced more virtue, exercised more charity. The number of souls who each year went to hell might have been fewer. Since we do not know the population of hell we shall have to wait until some time later to discover what harvest the devil has reaped from our materialism, and how helpful advertising has been in the matter.

The more "scientific" advertising becomes the more clearly it reveals its diabolical intent. Messrs. Batten, Barton, Rubicam and the rest begin to reveal themselves as front men (whether innocently or not is here beside the point) for a chief executive dressed in red.

Advertising concentrates its biggest guns on our imaginations, following the hackneyed and successful technique of the devil. That is why advertising is mostly pictures, to which copy is secondary. This is also the principle behind the singing commercial. Music has a stronger effect on the imagination and memory than does the spoken word. If the imagination is worked on long enough it can distort the intellect and so move the will to make a choice that it wouldn't have made otherwise. As the theologians put it, the idea is to make something seem good which isn't good.

One of the principles of advertising is that people can be reached better when they are tired (standing up in a crowded subway car at the end of a day, with nothing to do but stare vacantly at the car card advertisement in front of them), or when they are in an unintellectual mood (such as during the emotional fervor following on soap opera), than when they are awake, alert and calculating. What the advertisers mean to say is that their products can be foisted on us better in our least human moments. The devil thought that up long ago, too.

When copywriters talk about the "appeal to reason" they mean usually the appeal to rationalization—here they are concerned to help their victims justify themselves for doing something which is not advisable. We rationalize our misdeeds because our will can choose something only as good. If the picture of the $79.95 spring suit, or the extra-fine flavored wine does not sufficiently overcome budgetary considerations, the devil (in the person of the copywriter) will whisper in our ear, "Only three cents a day" or "It pays to have the best."

And so it goes. We could make a list of the seven capital sins and their progeny and collect advertisements to fit each case. The advertising textbooks are not as skillful at analyzing the appeals as a moral theologian would be, but all the temptations have been used even if they haven't all been catalogued. Let us consider here only one of them: lust.

People who think in moral terms would be shocked at the naivete with which advertisers consider the use of "sex appeal" in their advertisements. "Sex always attracts attention," is one of their principles. They go on from there (even while loudly defending the honor of their profession) to discuss, not whether it is moral to use sex appeal, but the difficulties of turning sex attraction into sales of an irrelevant product. While thus concentrating on the almighty dollar the advertisers have gone far in the last several years toward becoming large-scale purveyors of pornography.

"God gives each man a certain talent which he can use in a variety of ways, though not in all ways. Because of the materialistic orientation of our civilization men have turned to the construction of skyscrapers the gifts which might have been used for building cathedrals."

Legitimate "Advertising"

Not everything that looks like advertising is advertising as we have defined it, that is, a business or "profession" which exists to create new desires for material goods. This new thing, the pioneer millionaires of which are not yet old men, is the hypodermic needle which has produced a sudden flush of life in a dying capitalism. It brought into existence the advertising man, the advertising agency, the courses in advertising and the painstaking development of the Science of Temptation.

There is another thing which is neither new nor reprehensible. We shall call it "announcing." It is this which dates back to ancient Egypt and which advertising books

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Author Recommendation and Music Appreciation

Dear Editor,

I have been disappointed to find the “letters to the editor” section empty in the last few editions, so I thought I better do my bit and make a contribution.

What does the esteemed editor think of the works of Neville M. Gwynne? He is a traditional Catholic who has written excellent works on Grammar, History, Philosophy, Evolution vs creation etc., I think they are quite underappreciated, I would love if you wrote a book review of his.

Also, if I may, does the cultured editor (or any helpful readers) have any recommendations for an album of traditional boys-choir Christmas carols? I can’t find any produced in the twenty-first century without modernist jazz-harmonies or distasteful trumpets, and I find any produced before that time have terrible music quality.

God bless you.
— Anonymous.

Thank you for your letter, Anonymous.
To answer your first question: no I have not encountered the works of Neville M.

Gwynne. A fine Welsh surname with an even finer sense of religion!

I will make an effort to become acquainted with his work after my current back-log and get back to you. The topic of Creation vs Evolution is certainly a controversial one (though I am not sure why), with many modern, and even “traditional” folk attempting to reconcile two thousand years of the Church’s tradition with the slop-science pedalled today. I am afraid that’s all I am competent to add to the matter at this point.

Regarding Christmas music, I have found that, until I can find something better, I cannot help but go back to King’s College Choir. When the Anglican Church is inevitably reconciled with Rome (eternal Rome, that is), I think that the Anglican musical tradition will require only very slight changes to obtain its Catholic orthodoxy.

Perhaps I may piggy-back on your call for a musical soul out there amongst the readership to point us in the right direction.

God bless you!

try to identify with modern advertising. But announcing is specifically different from modern advertising, because its end is different. It wants to “let people know” that Bill Smith is opening a dentist’s office or that such-and-such a ship is sailing next week and can take passengers. It doesn’t try to make us buy what we “don’t need, don’t want and can’t afford.” Announcing is moral if what is announced conforms to the laws of morality and needs to be made known. Normally, announcing demands merely simplicity and clarity, and can be taken care of by the head bookkeeper or the third vice-president. Of itself, it would never have given rise to a “profession” of Advertising, if you could call it that, was once beautiful and added to public life.

The need for announcing has continued with the advent of advertising. Furthermore, since advertising has set up such a clamor, announcing has to compete a little with it just in order to be heard. This causes confusion in the popular mind, but it oughtn’t to confuse us very much. About the only advertising which is essentially pure (it may have accidental evils) is the advertising of Catholic books and magazines. The appeal here is to truth and spiritual progress, neither of which can possibly be the object of the passion of concupiscence. With secular books, distinctions have to be made. No one can deny that the most blatant appeal in publishers’ advertisements, even in The New York Times, is to juicy passages, that is, lust. Still, considerable book advertising, especially of technical books, is not suspect. In fact, legitimate advertising is limited generally to the technical fields and even there it is sometimes illegitimate. There is another field of “mixed” good and bad advertising. The steamship lines come in here. They have a perfect right to announce their sailings but their ad appeal (and their ships) often exceed a due measure in respect of luxury. Store advertising is also of the mixed variety. The local grocer’s ad in the evening paper (usually little more than a price list) is much more legitimate than the canner’s luscious display ads in the women’s magazines. Department store advertising is mostly of the concupiscence sort, though there is a small element of announcing. Neither Macy’s nor Gimbel’s could stave off bankruptcy if they were to cease advertising, even for a short time. Their profit must therefore rest on the selling of unnecessary things for which there is no spontaneous desire.

What we are trying to show in this article is not that Mr. X or Mr. Y has no right to advertise his product. Let each manufacturer or store owner or insurance company examine its own conscience in the matter. We are more concerned to show the shaky foundations on which advertising rests (as a profession or a business). Young men and women who aspire to become account executives or copywriters would do well to turn their talents to more godly uses. It is hard to see how they could justify offering their services to the ordinary advertising agency. Most whose aspirations lie along those lines start out without any misgivings because advertising is considered generally an acceptable, indeed an especially desirable, career. It is only afterwards that consciences begin to be troubled. Many who feel vague misgivings are unable to ferret out the root evil. This article is written especially for them. If advertising is ordered against God, then no one has a vocation to pursue it, and learning that it is wrong may be a step in the direction of a Christian career, which measures success in conformity to God’s will.

Pastoral Letter on the Situation in Ukraine

Ukraine Liberated in World War II

Bishop André Cheptytsky

As part of the English speaking world, we are not accustomed to considering the events of World War II outside of the lens of propaganda. During the Second World War, the Soviets—allied with the liberal democracies of the West—fueled by an anti-Christ blood-lust, rampaged westward in an attempt to spread their Talmudic revolution by force across Europe. As such, when this revolutionary wave meet their match in the Germans on the Eastern Front, it is no wonder that the Catholics greeted the German Army as liberators. This short letter gives a flavour for the atmosphere in many of these eastern states upon the arrival of not just the Germans, but also their international volunteer divisions drawn from most every nation in Europe. After World War II ended, marking the end (and failure) of the European struggle against Bolshevism, many of these liberated countries were turned back over to the Soviets at the hands of the liberal democracies of the USA, Britain and France. Many Catholics in these lands have struggled to forget the perfidy of the Allied Powers for their actions.

To the Ukrainian People! Pastoral letter of His Excellency Metropolitan André Cheptytsky.

By the Will of Almighty and Most Merciful God, Unique in the Trinity, a New Era has begun in the life of the unitary and independent

State of Ukraine. The popular assemblies, held yesterday, have confirmed and proclaimed this historical event. In announcing to you, Ukrainian People, the fulfillment of our suppliant prayers, I call upon you to manifest your gratitude toward the Most High, your fidelity to His Church, and your obedience to Authority.

Times of war will demand many more sacrifices, but the work begun in the Name of God and with His Grace will be brought to a happy end. The sacrifices that will evidently be necessary to reach our goal will manifest, above all, through docile submission to the just laws of God, without opposing the orders of the Authority. In this historical hour, the Ukrainian People must show that they possess enough sense of authority, solidarity, and vitality to deserve a place among the nations of Europe, in which they may deploy all the strengths that God has given them.

Through your discipline, your solidarity, and the conscientious fulfillment of your duties, prove that you are mature for State Life. We salute the victorious German Army as the liberator from the enemy. To the established authority, we render the obedience that is due to it. We recognize Mr. Yaroslav Stetsko as Head of the Regional Government of the Western Territories of Ukraine. From the Government he has called to life, we expect wise and just conduct, as well as measures that take into account the needs and the well-being of all citizens inhabiting our country, without distinction of religion, nationality, or social status. May God bless all your works, Ukrainian People, and may He grant all our Leaders the Holy Wisdom from Above.

Given in Lviv, at Saint George’s Cathedral, on July 1, 1941.

The Role of Punishment

The Role of A Christian Father

Fr W. Cramer SJ

Fr Cramer explains that meting out punishment is a role that belongs properly to the head of any society. Of course this topic is controversial today, and fathers can even find themselves on the wrong side of the apparent civil-law when fulfilling their duty in this regard. Fr Cramer examines the situation and provides a Catholic view on this responsibility. From his work The Christian Father published in 1883.

St. Paul says: "For what son is there whom the father does not correct?" (Heb. xii. 7), and he adds, "Persevere, therefore, under discipline. God dealeth with you as with his sons" meaning that when he punishes you he shows himself a father. "Whom the Lord loveth he chastiseth, and he scourgeth every son whom he receiveth" (Heb. xii. 6); that is, whom he graciously intends to lead to goodness and eternal life. There appears to be a contradiction in these words "whom the Lord loveth he chastiseth," and yet such is not the case, for they contain a salutary truth. The Apostle explains it in the eleventh verse, where he says: "All chastisement for the present indeed seemeth not to bring with it joy, but sorrow: but afterwards it will yield to them that are exercised by it"—exercised by chastisement unto Christian perfection, "the most peaceful fruit of justice." The sufferings with which God visits his children to preserve them from sin and to lead them to Christian perfection are nothing when compared to the sufferings caused by sin. If, then, punishment or chastisement is a means to obtain happiness it is an evidence of God's love for us when he inflicts it.

In this our heavenly Father is the model for human fathers. The laws of God, the precepts of the Church, and the rules laid down by the father are the way in which the child must walk to become a useful citizen and a good Christian, and gain temporal and eternal happiness. That, therefore, which tends to keep the child in this road, or lead it back to it when astray, is beneficial to it, and its application is a sign of genuine love for the child.

When, therefore, a child is led by bad inclinations, bad example, or by temptations of the enemy to depart from the right way, and when it will not be induced to return by mildness, advice, and admonition, the father will adopt sterner means; he will punish and chastise his child to curb its perverse will and overcome its obstinacy.

This "for the present indeed seemeth not to bring with it joy" neither for father nor child. The little one sighs, weeps, and pleads. The father's natural feelings revolt; his heart is moved by the pitiful appeals of the child. And yet he must overcome all this. He must wield the rod, and if he fail to do this his injudicious forbearance will foster disobedience with all its evil consequences, and cause the child miseries in comparison with which the transient sufferings from deserved punishment will appear as nothing. On the other hand, punishment inflicted in the proper manner and at the proper time will regulate the will of the child, subdue its stubborn haughtiness, and conquer its perversity. Such punishment will lead the child into the way of God's holy will and obtain for it "the peaceful fruit of justice."

According to this it appears to be a sacred duty of fathers to punish their children when occasion requires it. As evidence of this paternal obligation we may refer to the terrible punishment which the Lord inflicted on the high-priest Heli because he did not correct and punish his two sons, who, priests like himself, performed their duty negligently and gave great scandal to the people. "In that day," said the Lord, "I will raise up against Heli all the things I have spoken concerning his house, for I have foretold unto him that I will judge his house forever, for iniquity, because he knew that his sons did wickedly, and did not chastise them" (I. Kings iii. 12, 13). "I will begin and I will make an end." And soon after these words were fulfilled. In a battle against the Philistines he permitted "Israel to be overthrown... and there was an exceeding great slaughter, for there fell of Israel thirty thousand footmen. And the ark of God was taken; and the two sons of Heli, Ophni and Phinees, were slain" (I. Kings iv. 10, 11). And as a messenger gave an account of it to Heli, who was ninety-eight years old, "he fell from his stool backwards by the door, and broke his neck, and died" (verse 18). Can we still doubt that it is a strict obligation for fathers to chastise their children as the occasion may require, and when necessity demands?

We say advisedly, as the occasion may require. The reason why children are punished is to make them obedient, or to bring them back to obedience. If this end can be gained by mild means, such as teaching, advising, and admonishing, it would be an abuse of authority to inflict corporal punishment. How often do children fail more through ignorance and want of thought than through malice or perverse will? Now if you teach them, and warn them to be more careful in future, you will almost always gain your point; but if in such cases you inflict corporal punishment when not deserved it acts injuriously on the mind of the child, particularly if it be naturally timid. In every case where a child can be brought to a sense of its duty by kind though earnest words and fatherly advice this method of correction should be preferred to corporal punishment.

We have said where necessity demands it and when it is useful. It is the interest which the father has in the welfare of his child that causes him to punish it, that it may correct its faults and lead a good life. The great Father of mankind had this object in view when he gave man authority to inflict punishment. To be carried away by impatience and anger at the misconduct and failings of your children, or to be led by momentary aversion, ill-will, or bad humor to inflict punishment on them, is to abuse the authority which God has reposed in you. Such punishment is a mere gratification of your own passion, and thus while you correct your child's fault you commit a greater one yourself. It is evident that such treatment is worse than useless. And how can it be otherwise when it proceeds from such improper motives and is inflicted so injudiciously.

But let us suppose that the punishment inflicted is in keeping with the nature of the child and its offence, yet in the supposition made above the father will scarcely be able to inflict it with the necessary calmness. The punishment will be accompanied with abuse, reproaches, anger, and too great severity or cruelty. When even a deserved punishment is thus inflicted, the child is outraged by its father and its feelings are wounded. It feels the injustice of the punishment inflicted in this way, and is shocked at seeing its own father rising as an enemy and treating it with such cruelty, and in such an unworthy and passionate manner. A deadly blow is thus given to its young heart, and the veneration which it naturally had for its father is replaced by a sentiment of contempt and scorn!

This is certainly a punishment that will not only not cure the child's faults and failings, but will increase them.

Alas, how often are such methods adopted by fathers in punishing their children! What a responsibility! Those appointed by God to be the father and friend of their children become their worst enemies! The manner in which they inflict punishment does their children incalculable injury. St. Paul had this in view when in writing to the Ephesians he said: "And you, fathers, provoke not your children to anger, but bring them up in the discipline and correction of the Lord" (Eph. vi. 4). The Apostle means to say, keep your children under discipline, punish them when necessary, but as God does, who punishes with justice, mercy, and indulgence. Writing to the Colossians the same Apostle says: "Fathers, provoke not" by unreasonable punishment "your children to indignation, lest they be discouraged" (Coloss. iii. 21).

Thus far we have spoken of the manner in which punishment is inflicted, but how often do not parents commit another fault by want of care and intelligence in the selection and choice of the proper punishment to be inflicted.

The child must be punished, but there are many kinds of punishments. If we judged by the conduct of some parents we would conclude that there is but one kind—flogging. The children are flogged with rods and sticks and beaten with clubs; their ears are cuffed and wrenched, their hair pulled and the first thing that comes to hand is hurled at their heads.

Now we think, and with good reason, that some of these punishments are entirely unworthy of a Christian father (and mother), particularly when inflicted in a fit of anger. Common-sense and Christian forbearance forbid a parent to punish his child in this way.

There are, however, some punishments which are permitted; for instance, a father may use a rod or whip, and according to circumstances he may box the ears or slap the cheek, for there are some children who cannot be brought to a sense of their duty by any other means. There are cases also where punishment should be inflicted on the spot—then and there.

But to insist on punishing indiscriminately all children, and in every case by corporal punishment, is most unreasonable. As we have seen, it deprives the children of the beneficial effects of the chastisement. We have said above that there are different kinds of punishments. It is punishment for a child to deprive it of certain things that it loves—if it is not permitted to play at a certain time; if it is kept waiting a short time for its dinner or supper; if forbidden to make visits, and to play at times with its little companions; if deprived of its toys, etc. It is also a punishment to oblige the child to do something that is unpleasant or disagreeable; for instance, to remain alone for a short time; to do some work for which it feels a repugnance; to wear for a time old and shabby clothes; to do something that is humiliating, etc.

Among such a variety the parents can always find that which is best adapted to attain the end for which the punishment is inflicted—the amendment of the child. Who can deny that mild punishments do more good to a naturally timid child than harsh and severe treatment does? Punishments that are proper for small children are not adapted to grown up boys and girls. Some humiliating task should be given for faults that originate in pride and self-esteem, and sensuality should be met by privation of what is gratifying to the senses.

Can you find a sensible artisan or mechanic who, having all the various tools necessary for his work, will take the first tool that comes to hand, whether it be the right one or not? You certainly cannot. The artisan will select that tool best fitted for the work he is at; he won't take a saw to plane a board or a hammer to saw it. Now the education (bringing up) of children is a most important work; and yet when parents who are engaged in this work have to inflict punishment they apply the first that suggests itself instead of selecting carefully the best and most useful method!

The counsel and advice which we have given to fathers are certainly not very easy to carry out. It is indeed easier not to punish at all than to punish in the proper manner. To exercise the right of inflicting punishment requires great devotion to the welfare of the child; it requires great pains, much reflection and deliberation, and not a little self-sacrifice. But it is a sacred duty and a condition of the father's eternal welfare. And here are verified the words of the Lord: "The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence; and the violent bear it away" (Matth. xi. 12). Besides, if the right of punishing is properly and faithfully exercised it will bear precious fruit in the children, and is therefore well worthy of all the father's sacrifices and pains. The father who does his duty in this regard will reap a great reward here on earth and still a greater reward in eternity for his cares, anxieties, and sacrifices; while those who do not keep their children under discipline, or do not do so in a proper manner, suffer grief, affliction, anxiety, and trouble in this world from the perverse conduct of their children. And what will be their lot in eternity!

What Hides Within This Work?

Fr Henri Desportes

Continuing on from May's Issue of The Plough, our author sheds some light on the contents of the Talmud. Published in 1899.

We will only give a brief overview of the dogmas professed in the Talmud. What we mainly want to study in this work is Talmudic morality, and the sad fruits it has engendered. However, it is necessary for the reader to learn, through a few quotes, what blasphemies are contained in the religious code of the Jews of our time.

Pierre le Vénérable, abbot of Cluny, Rohrbacher recounts, wrote a treatise in five books against the Jews; and, in the fifth, he confounds them by simply turning against them the absurd and impious fables of the Talmud. In one of them, to the question: "What does God do in heaven?" the pages of the master book answer: "He does nothing but assiduously read the Talmud, and to confer with the Jewish scholars who composed it. Now, one day, in one of these conferences, it was a question of different kinds of leprosy, and someone asked if such a disease was or was not a leprosy. God was of one opinion, and unfortunately for him, the rabbis were of another. Following heated discussions, the decision of this case was referred by common agreement to Rabbi Nehemiah, whom the earth still had the good fortune to possess. The idea then came to God to send down the angel of death, with the mission of bringing to heaven the soul of this sage; but the angel found this rabbi reading the Talmud, and the Talmud is such a holy reading that whoever delves into it cannot die. The angel was therefore obliged to use cunning; and, according to the order of the Lord, he made such a racket above the rabbi's house, that the latter momentarily averted his eyes from the Talmud and could be struck."

The soul of Rabbi Nehemiah immediately rose towards the celestial dwellings; it found God fully occupied with discussing the question and defending it against the holy doctors of Judaism, and exclaimed at the outset: "No, certainly, this disease is not leprosy!" — God blushed with his defeat, but he did not dare to rebel against the decision of such a great doctor, and soon he was heard exclaiming: "Ah! my children have defeated me!"

These sad ramblings are reminiscent of the doctrinal follies of the Hindus regarding divinity; those who were the chosen people have now descended to the lowest rank of humanity. This is how the proud are punished: they have failed to recognize God and his prophetic orders, God has taken away the light that guided them and today they do not even realize that they are ridiculous. Here is further proof:

"God," they say, "repents of having scattered the Jews and of having cast them into misfortune: he himself has made himself unhappy by this fault, and every day since then, two large tears fall from his eyes into the ocean; the sound of the waves and the earthquakes have no other cause. He made an oath that was null and culpable when he swore that the Israelites would have no part in eternal life; but he has released himself from this oath."

"God once lied to establish peace between Abraham and Sarah; for the sake of peace, it is therefore permissible for us to lie. God is the cause of sin, since he has given us a bad nature and has imposed on us the yoke of his law." Let us draw the conclusion from this abominable maxim: The Jew never sins, he is not responsible for any bad act.

It is not only the teaching of theodicy that is reprehensible. Superstitions and sorcery all have their foundation in the Talmud: "The patriarch Abraham," say the rabbis, "practiced sorcery, and he taught it: he wore a magical precious stone around his neck, which healed the sick, and the rabbis of the Talmud had some that could restore life to the dead."

"There are 600,000 souls created by God and drawn from divine substance: they belong to the Jewish race. The souls of other men come from demons and are similar to those of beasts. Cain had three souls, one entered the body of Korah, the other into Jethro, the third into the Egyptian whom Moses struck dead. The soul of Esau, murderer and adulterer, passed into the body of Jesus. Impious Jews, who apostatize or who kill a Jew, pass after their death into the state of an animal or plant, but their souls then transmigrate into humanity and ultimately return to the Israeli people; for every child of Abraham must end up entering eternal life."

"Hell is sixty times larger than paradise; for it is destined for all the uncircumcised, especially Christians."

"The Messiah will come and restore royalty to the Jews; all peoples and all kings will recognize him and serve him; but he will refuse the offerings of Christians; after his advent, every Jew will have 2,800 servants and 310 women."

These quotes are taken from a German brochure, which has become very rare, despite the editions and translations into French, English and Russian, which have been multiplied: the Jews hoard them as they appear and destroy them. The author, Dr. Rohling, has pledged to pay 1,000 thalers to anyone who proves the falsehood of any quote.

It is to this brochure that we will request documents on Jewish morality; another very rare book also, the Syrian Affairs, by Mr. Laurent, will provide us with some: these are passages translated in 1840, for the court of Damascus, by Mohammed-Effendi, a rabbi converted to Mohammedanism, of whom we will speak at greater length, in the account of the famous trial of 1840. The translations of this ex-rabbi have been completely approved by the grand rabbi of Damascus. There is no way to doubt their truthfulness and their accuracy.

On One's Neighbor

There is a sentiment that is found everywhere, except among certain savages, that of human fraternity. This sentiment is unknown among the Jewish nation: in the eyes of the orthodox Jew, anyone foreign to his religion is not a man, but a brute. According to the Talmud, it is a sin to associate with idolaters (non-Jews).

"An Israelite is more pleasing to God than angels. To slap him is as much as to slap God. A goy [non-jew, cattle] who strikes an Israelite is worthy of death. The race of Christians is a race of cattle: descended from the devil, they are given the name of pigs; they are not our fellow men any more than animals are, and it is not permissible to show them mercy; dissimulation and apparent displays of affection are only permissible in cases where one can derive an advantage from them."

"It is self-evident that when a traveler foreign to Judaism dies without leaving any proselyte children, he must be considered to have no heirs; whoever first comes into possession of his property shall be deemed the rightful owner."

Here are some excerpts translated by Mohammed-Effendi:

"The idolater who strikes an Israelite deserves death. Moses, during his stay in Egypt, killed an Egyptian, who, before his eyes, had struck an Israelite. To give a Jew a slap is as if you gave it to God."

"The idolater who sanctifies a day of the week deserves death, God having said: 'You shall not rest day or night;' he would incur this penalty, even if it were any day other than Saturday. The idolater who reads the Bible must also suffer death, the Bible being intended only for Jews. As for whoever takes it, he must perish." (Chap. Sahanderin, p. 58.)

This threat of death bursts forth from every page of the Talmud. "All peoples other than the Israelites are designated by the name sons of Noah," it is further stated,

"the latter having separated and having recognized God from the time of Abraham to Israel. The sons of Noah can be killed upon the condemnation of a single rabbi and the deposition of a single witness, even if the witness is a relative of the denounced individual. If the latter has killed a pregnant Jewish woman and caused the child she was carrying to die, he deserves death. It is otherwise for an Israelite, who can only be killed by a decision of twenty rabbis and two witnesses; moreover, he does not deserve death for having caused the child in his mother's womb to perish; such a Jew should pay the price of the child."

How could the most bitter fanaticism not emanate from these poisoned precepts? How could such advice not beget repulsion among the peoples thus treated? The Talmudists themselves foresaw this and they stooped to giving their co-religionists the following advice:

"If a Jew," they say in the treatise cited above, "walking in the street, meets a stranger, he shall make him pass on his right, if he is armed with a saber, and on his left, if he is equipped with a stick, because the saber is worn on the left, the Jew will be more able to restrain it in case the stranger tries to draw it, and the stick is held in the right hand, the Jew will take to the left, so as to restrain the other's hand, if he tries to raise the stick. If the stranger happens to be climbing a slope, the Jew should go ahead and be careful not to stoop for fear of being killed. If the other asks about his destination, he shall indicate a distant place, so that the stranger, relying on the length of the journey, may always think he has time to kill him, and so that he himself may by this expedient save his life."

Alongside these puerile or odious fears, we find expressed in regard to foreigners a contempt of which it is difficult to form an exact idea. Those who do not have the good fortune to be born into the glorious Jewish sect are by that very fact excluded from humanity: in the treatise Aroubim, it is said that their houses are veritable stables, and in the treatise Bahiamoteth, we read: "The tombs of foreigners do not defile, are not impure, like those of Jews, because they are animals."

These excerpts, in teaching us the true principles of Jewish morality, will help us understand in part the hatred that enveloped them in the Middle Ages; they were given retaliation, their own words were thrown back at them, as in Frankfurt where it was written at the entrance to the promenade: "Jews and pigs forbidden to enter here!"

NOTE FROM THE EDITOR

Welcome, dear Reader, to the tenth issue of The Plough.

I wish to speak briefly on a topic that ought to be more dear to me than it is, and that is the topic of prayer.

"The spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh weak."

It can be tempting in these confusing times to commit only our pious thoughts to God in prayer, and leave out those thoughts which we keep private to ourselves. How greatly saddened a father would be to have this shallow devotion from his own child!

Where does this timidity come from? Perhaps it is a habit learned from our social environment: we know that sometimes it is better to leave certain things unsaid around certain company. Perhaps, to a great or lesser extent, we are not well-understood by others—perhaps even by fellow kinsmen, or fellow Catholics. Perhaps we have been burnt in the past by a conversation that hit a wrong note. Perhaps rightly, we have learned to navigate aspects of social life with more tact, in order to save our personal resources for where they might be more useful.

But with God, let us do away with tact! Let us not be afraid of spilling our heart out to God, as He did for us, as He expired on that Holy Tree on Good Friday. We hide our tendermost thoughts from God as though He doesn't know them already. God knows all!

God knows, more than us, the turmoil of the world today. He knows the sufferings of his faithful who languish under the scourge of usury. He knows of our feckless leaders in the both the spiritual and temporal realms. He knows of the destruction of our civil patrimony, received from our fathers and awaited by our children. Let us then not fear to tell God of these things and ask for succor.

We need His help, so let us not be afraid to ask. Let us then not dread our time of prayer and see it as a time for false piety, but rather let us see prayer as time spent with an all-powerful, all-knowing, and all-loving Father.

Thank you for your loyal patronage, dear Reader, and may God bless you,

Editor of The Plough.
